

The Pros and Cons of going to an Online College

In these days of a busy, fast-paced lifestyle it might be an inconvenience for some to attend college at a physical college campus. This may be due to a number of reasons, including ties to your current work or job, as well as family obligations and transportation issues.

Luckily there are methods available such as distance education, to cater to these busy lifestyles. Thanks to the advancement of the internet, many students can easily take College courses from the comfort of their own home. This allows the student to work at his or her own pace, as schedules can be made more flexible and worked around on a time available basis. Many distance courses require that you only have to attend when the degree exam is conducted by the college.

Now with stricter accreditation, online colleges have received a better reputation in the field of education, and provide a great service to those who are currently in the workforce trying to improve their skills and advance their careers. All that is basically required for distance education courses is a computer with an Internet connection.

The advantages of going to an online College:

- Attendance in a College classroom is not required. You can set the pace of study yourself and do it at your own convenience.
- You can finish the course program in a shorter amount of time. A program can be completed within a period of 1 to 2 years, whereas the same program at a traditional College usually takes 3 to 4 years for completion.
- Tuition at an online College is usually considerably cheaper than brick and mortar campuses.
- (Many of the reputed colleges have started an online degree program which is very similar to their regular courses.
- No commute. Why deal with traffic, when you can work from the comfort of any internet connection.

Disadvantages:

- The first problem with online Colleges is that there is no face-to-face interaction easily possible between the teacher and the student. This is hard for some students and may create problems when it comes to learning the material and keeping a satisfactory grade.
- Degrees from non-accredited online colleges have almost zero value in the market, so beware.
- One may not get the true "College experience".

If you are considering going to College online, or are at least considering it, you should search and compare your options.
